Re: Re-Examination of Claims Procedure Regulations for Plans Providing Disability Benefits
RIN No.: 1210-AB39
Regulation: 29 C.F.R. §2560.503

Dear Deputy Assistant Secretary Hauser:

I am writing to discourage the Department from modifying or further delaying the final disability claims regulations (Final Regulation on Claims Procedure for Plans Providing Disability Benefits, 81 Fed. Reg. 92316 (Dec. 19, 2016)) that are now scheduled to go into effect on April 1, 2018.

I have been practicing ERISA disability benefits law for over a decade and have represented many extremely disabled claimants attempt to get what they were promised by their plans.

While I am grateful for the opportunity to comment on the Department’s re-examination of the costs of the final rules governing disability claims, the concerns raised by the industry are not new. Rather, these objections appear to be simply re-argument of the merits of the final rules. Where those rules are based on policy choices that have been made by Congress, by this Department, and by the federal courts interpreting ERISA, another argument about the merits is unnecessary.

Nevertheless, I will address the objections that have been raised that I feel are most in need of a response.
Costs Will Not Increase

The industry claims if the final rules go into effect there will be an increase in costs that will increase premiums resulting in less access to disability benefits. This is not true.

The Department has already concluded, in response to various industry comments, that costs would not outweigh the benefits. An agency is not required to "conduct a formal cost-benefit analysis in which each advantage and disadvantage is assigned a monetary value." Michigan v. Environmental Protection Agency, 135 S. Ct. 1699, 2711 (2015).

Nonetheless, the Department has asked for data addressing whether costs increased in response to the last set of rules applying to ERISA disability plans that became effective in 2002. In fact, the Department can rely upon information supplied by its own Bureau of Labor Statistics. https://www.bls.gov/opub/btn/volume-4/disability-insurance-plans.htm.

The data show that access and participation in employer-based disability insurance has increased, not decreased, between 1999 and 2014. This increase occurred despite that employment in the service industry has increased, an industry in which employees are the least likely to have access to employer-based disability coverage. This increase also occurred despite the 2000 disability claims regulations and a series of court decisions addressing conflicted decision-making, deemed exhaustion, the need to discuss and explain adverse benefits decisions, and the participants right to respond to new evidence. I would therefore be suspicious of any data supplied by the industry now that suggests employers would abandon disability coverage due to the costs of codifying these principles. This BLS document also demonstrates that the cost of disability insurance is extremely modest. Thus, even if costs did increase, the increase would be so small that it is unlikely to make any difference.

Also, during the period covered by the BLS document, two major insurers with significant market share, UNUM and CIGNA, were examined by the states for poor claims handling and became subject to fines and Regulatory Settlement Agreements that raised the bar for their claims administration.
Nonetheless, during this period access and participation increased.

Given this history, I dispute any claim that costs will increase in response to the modest changes in the final rules. Accordingly, I urge the Department not to change the final rules in response to the industry’s strained logic that the costliness of the final rules will impact access to disability benefits in the workplace.

The Benefits Outweigh the Costs

The Department has recognized the important purpose of these regulations: to make sure claims are fairly adjudicated and to prevent unnecessary financial and emotional hardship. These benefits far outweigh any additional costs.

As it is, ERISA disability claimants who are denied their benefits face a process that is far below the standard for regular civil disputes. These procedural hurdles include: (1) there are no jury trials; (2) there is a closed record from the claims process that can rarely be supplemented in litigation; (3) courts often apply an unfavorable standard of review, and (4) there are no remedies to discourage unfair and self-serving behavior on the part of plans. This will never be a level playing field much less one that favors plan participants. United States v. Aegerion Pharmaceuticals, Inc., 2017 WL 5586728, at *7 (D.Mass. 11/20, 2017) ("The insurance industry found it could largely immunize itself from suit due to the Employee Retirement Income Security Act ("ERISA").). Even with the final rules in place, plan participants will not have achieved the “higher-than-marketplace standards” that the Supreme Court insists are required in processing ERISA claims. MetLife v. Glenn, 554 U.S. 105, 115 (2008). Any consideration the Department makes about the benefits of the final rules relative to costs should take this “higher-than-marketplace” expectation into account and acknowledge that ERISA exists to protect plan participants.

The Department has already acknowledged that the disability claims industry has been needlessly adversarial toward ERISA disability plan participants. The industry’s claims that the new regulations will be bad for participants is no more credible than the fox’s claim the best interests of the hens would be served by tearing down the hens’ house.

Furthermore, from the perspective of plan participants, an inexpensive but illusory disability plan is worse than no plan at all. It is important to note that when a disability claimant is unfairly denied benefits that he/she thought was promised through an employer's plan, it is too late to go out and purchase private individual insurance to cover the risk of becoming destitute. Disabled claimants are often shocked when they are told about ERISA's procedural hurdles. So, to the extent that increased protections bring disability claims administration in line with the reasonable expectations of the employee-participants, the costs are outweighed by the benefits. Almost all of my clients who end up with their benefits have lost so much during the process, but there have been ones I haven’t been able to help at all. Just today I had to reject a client whose cognitive injuries were significant and because she did not understand the process before finding a lawyer, has run out of time to put together all of the necessary documentation to convince the plan of her disability. Her very disability is what is preventing her from proving her disability.

Any modest costs of the proposed regulations are far outweighed by the enormous benefits to plan participants.

Requiring the Plan to Discuss the Basis for Disagreement with Social Security Decisions or Other Contrary Opinions is Not Costly.

This rule merely requires disability plans to observe a fundamental due process principle that is imbedded in ERISA—namely the principle that a claimant is entitled to a well-articulated explanation for the adverse benefits decision so that the participant may fairly dispute it. The 2000 regulations require no less.

As the Department has already noted, it is doubtful that there are costs associated with the requirement of discussing the reasons for disagreeing with a favorable Social Security decision. ERISA disability benefits have always been deeply intertwined with the Social Security system and mostly are simply supplemental to Social Security benefits. Most disability plans require claimants to apply for the SSA benefit, and the plans usually provide representation for claimants before the SSA. This is done so that the plan may take advantage of the plan term that the SSDI benefit will offset the LTD benefit. Indeed, in many cases the ERISA disability benefit is de minimis or non-existent once this offset is taken. In order to decide which claimants qualify for this representation, plan claims handlers need to know the standard that the SSA uses. Comment #114, p.8 (ACLI).

To the extent that the industry argues that increasing the cost of disability insurance will burden the government, and more specifically the SSA, the Bureau of Labor Statistics publication speaks to this:

It is important to note that expanding access to employer-provided disability insurance would not necessarily relieve the burden on SSDI. The ability to access disability insurance does not affect a worker’s eligibility for SSDI. People can receive SSDI benefits and long-term disability payments, but the private disability insurance payment is usually reduced by the amount of the SSDI payment.
Additionally, the disability plans and insurers are required in many jurisdictions to discuss why they are denying a disability claim when the Social Security Administration awarded benefits under an obviously more strenuous standard. Montour v. Hartford Life & Acc.Ins Co., 588 F.3d 623, 635-637 (9th Cir. 2009); Salomaa v. Honda Long Term Disability Plan, 642 F.3d 666, 679 (9th Cir. 2011); Bennett v. Kemper Nat. Services Inc., 514 F.3d 547, 553-554 (6th Cir. 2008); Brown v. Hartford Life Ins. Co., 301 F. App'x 777, 776 (10th Cir. 2008). As a matter of Supreme Court precedent, it is arbitrary and capricious for the claims administrator to advocate for Social Security benefits, reap the benefit of the Social Security award by means of an offset, and then ignore the SSA’s determination. Metropolitan Life v. Glenn, 554 U.S. 105 (2008). As the industry comments often acknowledged, requiring an explanation of the reasons for disagreeing with the Social Security decision and other contrary evidence tracks the existing standard. Logically, it should not increase costs to simply codify this standard.

A rule clarifying that an explanation of the basis for disagreeing with a Social Security decision is a requirement will increase uniformity and predictability in the process, which is generally associated with costs savings and not cost increases.

The Deemed Exhausted Rule Is Not Costly

The industry’s concern about this rule seems to be that plaintiffs and their attorneys will race into court, increasing the volume of ERISA litigation and hence the overall costs of administering disability claims. This is incorrect. Plaintiff’s attorneys are ever mindful of building a record on which the court will make its decision and therefore would rather engage in the appeal process and exhaust internal remedies. This serves the dual purpose of possibly resolving the dispute and creating a record for the court to review in case the dispute cannot be resolved internally. Under the final rule, the plaintiff will mostly obtain a remand with instructions for the plan to do its job. Because plaintiff’s attorneys usually work on a contingent fee basis, it does not make sense to undertake litigation that is not absolutely necessary and that will not result in resolving the case on the merits.

Further, a court will only award attorney fees for litigation where the plaintiff has achieved some degree of success on the merits. Hardt v. Reliance Standard Life Ins. Co., 560 U.S. 242, 255 (2010). In other words, the industry comments are seriously out of step with litigation in the real world and how the incentives are aligned to discourage litigation. While this rule may appear to create additional trips to court, it will not do so except in the most extreme cases. I take it that addressing these extreme cases is the purpose of the final deemed denied rule.
Additionally, as with most of the other final rules, this rule is simply a codification of existing judge-made law. Claimants are already able to get into court when the claims process has failed them in a meaningful way. See e.g. Brown v. J.B. Hunt Transp. Servs., 586 F.3d 1079, 1085-86 (8th Cir. 2009) (failure to respond to request for documents excused claims from exhaustion requirement because there was no full and fair review). It is not likely that additional costs will result from this regulation. Hall v. National Gypsum Co., 105 F.3d 225, 231-32 (5th Cir. 1997); LaAsmar v. Phelps Dodge Corp. Life, 605 F.3d 789 (10th Cir. 2010); Nichols v. Prudential Ins. Co. of Am., 406 F.3d 98 (2d Cir. 2005); Jebian v. Hewlett-Packard Co. Employee. Benefits Org. Income Prot. Plan, 349 F.3d 1098 (9th Cir. 2003); Dunnigan v. Metropolitan Life Ins. Co., 277 F.3d 223, 231 n.5 (2d Cir. 2002).

Providing the Right to Review and Respond to New Evidence or Rationale From the Plan During the Appeal Review is Not Costly.

This rule is fundamental to full and fair review. The Department has already acknowledged the importance of this rule and that it is already the standard in some jurisdictions. The industry complains that providing the claimant with new evidence or rationales before making a final decision is costly. The industry’s claim to cost impact is is suspect for several reasons.

First, several disability plans or insurers already provide for the right to review and respond. They do so on a voluntary basis, as their comments to the proposed rules showed. Second, courts require plans or insurers to do this in many cases. Last, whether they provide this information to the claimant during the ERISA appeal process, they will have to provide it eventually in one form or another. New reasons or evidence will need to be included in the claim file and likely again in 26(a)(1) disclosures. Thus, the industry's portrayal of the chaos that might ensue if they were required to supply these documents is not credible. If the issue is the cost of mailing, such a concern should not be permitted to interfere with such basic a due process right.

It is important to note what this rule does. It permits a claimant to respond to a disability claims administrator’s assertions in a way that will make the response a part of the record if the claimant has to go to court to vindicate his/her rights. This is because most ERISA cases are decided on a closed record. Without this rule, the claims administrator’s new evidence or rationale will be included in the record that the court reviews, but the claimant’s rebuttal will not. Perhaps what the industry is really chafing about is the loss of its ability to strategically withhold information that would help the claimant achieve reversal or win his/her case in court.

There is no question in my mind, after years of experience representing ERISA claimants, that the ability to sandbag the claimant with a new medical opinion that he/she cannot refute, or a new plan provision to rely upon that he/she cannot counter, is a prized device in the disability claims industry. Recently, we had a client with a limited period of depression—for which she was seeking a limited period of benefits. She submitted her documents and the insurer surveilled her eating lunch. They sandbagged her with a psychiatrist’s review of that video. The same psychiatrist called my client’s doctors and then lied about his attempts to contact them. We had to litigate to get my client her benefits, which resulted in her ultimately getting less than she was due. The final rule needs to be kept in place to prevent this behavior from stamping out otherwise meritorious disability claims.

If the industry’s concern is that the claims handlers need to do more in the same amount of time, this could be addressed by modifying the rule instead of eliminating the rule altogether. Commenters from both sides have suggested as much.

I also dispute the industry’s comments to the effect that a second appeal, which is offered with some plans, serves the same purpose as the right to respond to new evidence or rationales before a final decision. This is clearly not true, as a second appeal permits the claims administrators the same sandbagging opportunity as the first appeal. Second appeals are not necessarily a boon to plan participants. Additionally, second appeals are not universal and are not required. The second appeals that the industry touts are a matter of plan design and can be changed at any time by plan sponsors. It may be that second appeals will become obsolete where the claimant has a true right to respond.

Other Provisions

The Impartiality Rule

Few industry commenters complained about the proposed rule requiring that consulting experts be impartial. Comment #76 (UNUM), Comment #92 (NFL), Comment #129 (AHIP). This muted objection is understandable, since it is hard to argue that disability claims administrators should be free to hire biased experts. The majority of those who object to this rule admitted that the proposed rule reflects the existing law. Comment #76, (UNUM), Comment #92 (NFL). The industry complaints seem to be based on the fear of increased litigation, particularly in the form of discovery. First, federal judges are well versed at limiting discovery in ERISA cases in proportion to the needs of the case. See e.g. Paquin v. Prudential Ins. Co. of Am. 2017 WL 3189550 (D. Colo. 7/10/2017); Heartsill v. Ascension Alliance, 2017 WL 2955008 (E.D. Mo. 7/11/2017); Ashmore v. NFL Player Disability and Neurocognitive Benefit Plan, 2017 WL 4342197 (S.D. Fla. 9/27/2017); Baty v. Metropolitan Life Ins. Co., 2017 WL 4516825 (D. Kan. 10/10/2017); Harding v. Hartford Life and Accident Ins. Co., 2017 WL 1316264 (N.D. Ill. 4/10/2017); Hancock v. Aetna Life Ins. Co., 321 F.R.D. 383 (W.D. Wash. 2017); Kroll v. Kaiser Foundation Health Plan Long Term Disability Plan, 2009 WL 3415678 (N.D. Cal. 10/22/2009). Next, if the impartiality rule is already the law, it is not clear how more discovery would result from codifying it. Additionally, the credibility of experts who are opining on whether a claimant qualifies for benefits should be subject to some sort of scrutiny. If a claimant needs to conduct discovery into whether a physician hired by the administrator is well-known to support denials, the cost of conducting this discovery cannot possibly outweigh the benefits. ERISA claimants are entitled to a process that does not have a predetermined outcome based on which reviewing physician is hired by the plan. This final rule addresses a serious problem in the ERISA disability claims process and should remain.
