General Comment

It would be improper to remove preventative healthcare coverage simply due to complaints based on narrow minded superstitions. Thousands of women will benefit from these benefits and this may even contribute to preventing the spread of disease. It is in the best public interest that these coverages become available. It should be the right of the covered party to choose whether to benefit from these coverages, not the decision of an abusive patriarchy to decide what options are available simply because a Pope sent out a piece of paper a hundred years ago prohibiting their particular religious sect from utilizing these benefits. If a group of Christian Scientists complained would you remove all coverage period? No, the religious have no right to an opinion on this matter, as they are affecting others with their ignorance.
