With the elimination of pensions and increase in the so called gig-economy employers have transferred the cost and responsibility of financial planning onto already overworked employees. The fiduciary rule is a small but absolutely necessary step towards protecting all Americans from potentially self-interested financial advisers. Eliminating the fiduciary rule has no benefit to working Americans. The rule should not be eliminated.