General Comment

The fact that the Department of Labor is trying to rush this rulemaking through by limiting public comment tells me that the rule is not fair to the public. If you have to hide your actions, you're ashamed of them, and that means you know that what you're doing is wrong.

Just as DOL has to answer to the people, plan fiduciaries should have to answer to the employees whose funds they're investing. Some Americans care about the environment, social and workplace equality, and human rights as well as funding their retirement. They should be able to exercise their social conscience through their ERISA retirement plans. What you're doing sounds very shady and I have to wonder how much the people who are trying to pass this rule will benefit financially. Despite a certain person's example, government does not exist to line lawmakers' pockets.

This rule would give earth-killing, discriminatory, anti-human rights companies an unfair advantage in the retirement investment field. I find that unconscionable.
